It is a third-person shooter.....Adsorption of caprolactam on activated carbon from activated sludge and studies of the adsorption kinetics. Adsorption kinetics were investigated using caprolactam as a probe compound in batch experiments. Experimental results indicated that the adsorption rate was limited by chemical processes, not by physical processes, and that the equilibrium was most likely to be reached in approximately 1 day. The equilibrium data were used to describe a simple mass transfer model with four kinetic components. This model was used to calculate the average kinetic parameters for each component using the nonlinear regression technique, and the estimated kinetic parameters were found to be in agreement with those obtained by the direct fitting method. The Henry's law constant, the solute capacity of the activated carbon (Q(2)), and the diffusion coefficient of caprolactam (D(2)) were also obtained with the model. The adsorption of caprolactam on activated carbon from a synthetic wastewater was studied using isothermal and nonisothermal kinetic models. The results obtained by the isothermal model were similar to those obtained with the nonisothermal model and showed the need to consider both the chemical and physical processes involved in the adsorption of the compound. The experimental kinetic data were fitted with the newly developed model of activated carbon for the adsorption of caprolactam, and the sorption capability of the activated carbon used in this study was found to be the best among the activated carbons tested. 3e33713323
